From Federation Press : Majah: Indigenous peoples and the law (Monograph series on law and justice) before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Majah: Indigenous peoples and the law (Monograph series on law and justice):

A glance at the chapters in this book discloses issues of great importance to the Australian people. They include: self-determination for Aborigines self-determination for Aborigines the impact of British law on colonised peoples deaths in custody the Convention Concerning Indigenous and Tribal Peoples in Independent Countries criminal law after Mabo v Queensland (No 2) incarceration of Aboriginal women intellectual property rights in indigenous art.

While several books have been published on rights of Australiaa (TM)s indigenous population, Majah approaches the subject from a unique angle. It is insightful, informative and quite comprehensive. Australian Lawyer, October 1996 'Majah' means 'white boss' to the Bundjalung people of north-eastern NSW... [This book] looks closely at the impact of the 'white boss' upon the Indigenous peoples of Australia. This collection challenges the perception of Australia as a post-colonial State and asserts that Australia's Aboriginals remain colonised in what is termed neocolonialism. The various authors make a strong call for indigenous self-determination. a | A well written and challenging book, Majah a | discloses many issues of importance which reflect the culture, perceptions, aspirations and concerns of Aboriginal people. Proctor (Law Society of Queensland), February 1997
